“Alternative asset classes contribute to the portfolio construction process by pushing back the efficient frontier, allowing the creation of portfolios with higher returns for a given level of risk or lower risk for a given level of returns.”

~ David Swenson - Chief Investment Officer, Yale University

Over the years we have studied and adopted what we refer to as the “endowment model” of investing, because we have observed that large college endowment funds generally seem to outperform smaller institutional portfolios over time. We believe they achieve this by employing the following investment best practices:

Long-Term View:

Larger endowments tend to take a longer-term view, seeking to grow their portfolios over time via consistent compounding rather than seeking high-risk, get-rich-quick strategies that can often prove counter-productive longer term.

Disciplined Approach:

Larger endowments tend to spend more time on defining their investment policy to guide their investment strategies and decisions. This helps avoid emotional decisions and knee-jerk reactions that can harm long-term results.

Also, larger endowments tend to focus on the highest-impact investment activities. The four major activities that contribute to long-term portfolio returns are 1) asset allocation strategy, 2) investment manager selection, 3) portfolio construction and 4) security selection. Academic literature shows that the majority of portfolio return over the long run comes from the first three activities. Yet the bulk of the investment industry focuses on the last activity - security selection - which is probably the most overvalued investment activity. Larger endowments tend to spend more time on the first three activities.

Broad Diversification:

Recent studies by Morgan Creek Capital Management have shown that reducing the volatility of a portfolio can harvest the power of compound interest and lead to greater wealth over time.

“Given two investments with the same average annual return over time, the one with the lower volatility will generate more wealth over the period. Over an extended period, an investment with the same rate of return but half the volatility always creates more wealth.” - Morgan Creek Capital Management.

Larger endowment funds understand that reducing volatility and preserving capital in down markets can lead to superior growth over the long term, so they tend to employ diversification strategies to reduce investment risk and swings in volatile markets. As a result, their portfolios tend to be more broadly diversified with a wide range of investment options including index funds, hedge funds, mutual funds and other vehicles to support low-volatility compounding and consistent returns across different market environments.

Alternative Investments:

Investment portfolio construction can be defined as the process of choosing the components of one’s investment portfolio in terms of asset classes. Traditional asset classes include stocks, bonds and cash.

In their efforts to reduce portfolio volatility, larger endowments and foundations have been leaders in the adoption of alternative investment strategies and have established significant alternative investment programs over the past few decades. Pension funds have been slower to adopt alternative investment strategies but have also been moving to increase their exposure to alternatives in recent years.

Alternative investment strategies focus on non-traditional asset classes. Examples include commodities, real estate, private equity and venture capital. Alternative investment strategies generally exhibit low correlations with the traditional asset classes of stocks, bonds and cash, offering the opportunity to lower portfolio volatility.

In recent years we have been emulating and promoting the above best practices of larger endowment funds. We encourage investors to adopt a long-term view and to develop clear investment policies that are well-diversified. We also encourage investors to learn more about the benefits of employing alternative investment strategies to reduce investment risk and reap the long-term performance benefits of lower-volatility compounding. When appropriately used, we believe that adding alternative investments to a traditional portfolio can boost future expected returns and reduce overall portfolio risk.

If you would like to learn more about these investment best practices or how alternative investment strategies may improve your portfolio, please call us. We will be happy to discuss this with you.
